Preserving Habitat for Rockhounds in the Mojave Desert

Presented by Lisbet Thoresen

The Mojave Desert attracts millions of visitors every year. Its geological features are unique in the world. Since the mid-19th century rockhounds have come to California's deserts in search of collectable minerals. This presentation showcases some of the Mojave's collectable minerals and historical desert localities where they are found. An overview is also presented on the changing landscape of land use policy that increasingly threatens to curtail access and accommodation of rockhounding and other low-impact recreational activities.
